Monoclonal antibodies against the C-terminal two-thirds of Semliki Forest virus capsid protein are broadly neutralizing. Seroepidemiological studies suggest that the Semliki Forest virus (SFV) nonstructural protein 3 is the main target of naturally occurring protective antibodies. To analyze this hypothesis we produced monoclonal antibodies against the C-terminal two-thirds of the SFV capsid protein by means of deletion mutants and characterized their specificities in vitro and their ability to neutralize SFV in cell culture. Monoclonal antibodies against the C-terminal two-thirds of the capsid protein were specific for the entire SFV capsid by binding Western blots. Two monoclonal antibodies were further tested in virus neutralization assays. Although both inhibited the fusion of the virus with the plasma membrane, only mAb 8E12 neutralized plaque formation and growth of infectious virus in cell culture. mAb 8E12 inhibited SFV hemifusion and fusion at a postattachment step, whereas virus internalization was inhibited at a postinternalization step. Like hemifusion and fusion, inhibition of
