In order to differentiate between species of Acanthamoeba species that causes keratitis, a set of diagnostic methods for microscopical examination of the trophozoites and cysts of 18 different isolates of Acanthamoeba was evaluated. The following stains were used: Harris-modified, Fast green, colloidal iron, Gram, T.M.A. and Giemsa. In addition, the identification of a few specimens was performed by scanning electron microscopy (SEM). The results were compared with those obtained with the transmission electron microscope (TEM). In 98% of the specimens it was possible to identify the species of Acanthamoeba isolates on the basis of all investigated methods. Most of the specimens of Acanthamoeba isolated from skin lesions were identified as Acanthamoeba castellanii (25/26), but several cases of A. castellanii could also be found in the cornea and mucosal membranes of the eyes. Differences in the identification of Acanthamoeba isolates were observed in 13 cases by microscopical methods alone; the results could be confirmed by SEM (13/14) or TEM (9/9). These results show that SEM and TEM are reliable methods for the identification of species of Acanthamoeba. At the present time, the value of light and scanning microscopy cannot be fully assessed as part of the routine diagnostic procedures. 754eb5d184
