A phone call wakes you, your alarm goes off and you start to rush around, planning to leave work early. Then you find yourself in the supermarket, visiting a child's nursery or child-care centre and listening to a lullaby on repeat. Is this real life, or something out of a movie? "People think we're in a bubble," says Sue Daly, CEO of Springvale Childcare Centre in Sydney's south-west. "It's like a pop culture thing. I think the 3AM shift is a great concept, but we do want to be careful we don't become a cultural icon. We want to be a child-care provider who's providing quality childcare and we want to be seen that way." Or, to be more precise, Daly wants to be seen as part of the way in which many people are finding new ways of looking after their children. The 3AM shift is an initiative of the Australian government's Children's Services department. It aims to alleviate pressure on child care by encouraging parents to switch to care providers that open until 4am, when demand for care is at its highest. The rationale behind it is simple: as baby-boomers reach retirement, and as the number of women in the workforce increases, the number of working hours parents spend caring for their children increases. The government's solution is to encourage more young Australians to become early-carer providers. There are some advantages to early child care, including the development of relationships between children and carers and the creation of a sense of
