Jun 7, 2018 . May 23, 2016 A: LiveCycle is typically not sold via serial number, but rather via a subscription. The serial number on the developer license you get from ADOBE will allow you to run the developer edition of LiveCycle Designer. You will be able to create forms or other documents, and these can be converted to templates that you can publish to your website or salesforce or whatever. LiveCycle Designer is not free and can only be downloaded via serial number. A: The LiveCycle Designer is available in a retail environment, through a serial number only. You can buy a license here. Q: Perl one-liner output does not match what it should I have the following snippet of perl: use 5.010; use warnings; use Storable qw(freeze thaw); use DBI; $t = DBI->connect('dbi:SQLite:', "", "", { RaiseError => 1, AutoCommit => 1 }); my $st = $t->prepare('SELECT * FROM table WHERE id =?'); $st->execute('1'); $dbrow = $st->fetchrow_array; if ($dbrow){ print "boom"; }else{ print "nope"; } the output of which is: nope why is the else statement not outputting the value? A: $st->fetchrow_array is returning the raw result from the database, so it's in list context. You should use $dbrow = $st->fetchrow_array; print $dbrow; instead. This way, Perl will auto-unpack the returned value. Note that the if will only ever be true when the row doesn't exist, since fetchrow_array returns the row only if it is found. In many cases, a requirement arises in a digital system for transferring a large amount of data to an external storage device, such as to a mass storage device like a disc drive.
